Gaston Palewski came to lunch at the Lanterne. It was he who saved it after the Liberation and had it renovated for the occupancy of General de Gaulle, who did not however use it, preferring a location in the Bois de Boulogne. Gaston is more insistent than ever upon the necessity for a strong government, but says he is for the first time in his political career profoundly discouraged over the possibility that the French will at long last move in this direction before it is too late. He fears a Popular Front.

Shot clay pigeons.
